Thought of the week:

Which skills are you building for the future?

What do you want to do when you grow up? This might be a question you've been asked at some point.

It's okay if you don't know the answer yet because our interests and passions change over time!

Just by taking part in clubs, spending time volunteering or meeting different people, you are building skills for your future.

People often choose their career based on the things they feel passionate about.

Other people look closely at hours of work and how much money they could be paid.

Thinking about these things, as well as the skills you have, can also help you decide what you'd like to do in the future!

On your career path...
To take your first steps into a career, you need a range of different skills. In your head, unscramble the words on the next few slides to guess which skills you need.

Clue:
You need this skill if you want to manage people doing their jobs and help them succeed.

Delving deeper...
Can you think of any other skills
you might need?

Be heard: Opportunities for the future

There are lots of interesting jobs around today, but some of them didn't exist five years ago! The world of work changes every day, and new technology and ideas change the types of jobs we can have.

For example, designing and building electric cars has created new jobs, skills, and opportunities.

This week you're discussing: "Could more be done to keep shop workers safe?"

Yes

1,300 shop workers are being disrespected each day. More needs to be done.

The plans in place are a good start, but they don't go far enough to keep people safe.

Scotland has a law in place to keep shop workers safe. This is needed across the UK.

There is lots being done already. I think it's more about people remembering their manners.

We need to give the plans in place time to work. I think they will put people off being disrespectful.

I don't think a law would help to keep shop workers safe.
